Regulate roadside memorials

A wooden cross stands truly forever being memorial as along the curved ground where loved ones have been lost. These roadside memorials stand at the side of high ways or busy routes made unbecoming streets of how daily numbers can be.

As on Oct. 21, I drove away about roadside memorials. People stated that their were bothered by them, saying they were eyesores and dangerous distractions. The question then is: memorial of someone's death can be in my way? It is a truly a small reminder one of the place that loved one took live or lay last breath.

The story also included that someone had to be down a seasonal route and righted it with a sign saying the death should be remembered as a memory. That is past as had as downing a grave.

People can have their opinion, that is no problem, but when people should not do or desire something that is agreed to one can do just because they don't like it. Although we do respect how with the fact that who lives but loved one, to respect road accidents, we do believe that there should be a more regulation on their roadside memorials.

Western Ontario says that roadside memorials result in 100 fatalities a year in Canada. Could you think of someone put up roadside memorials every time someone died and wanted to keep it up forever? Trying to work at the grocery store would become such a depressing part of the day. There would be a memorial of someone's death on every road.

Yes, maybe it is as long as to keep it as a memorial? How do you tell people that they can't have a certain amount of time to give it in that spot?

It is up to Western Ontario to regulate possibly side roads.

There will not be no way decision for them to make because it does not matter what way you look at it, as one is going to be completely in support with what way decision that is made in a month 31 months.

In the end, who would be in charge of taking memorials down when the time came?

Would the family be the more responsible to dispose of it or would be the region?

There are all questions that are left to be answered. We can only hope that in the end something can be put in place so that families can have time to grieve the loved ones they have lost.

In the meantime, people who absolutely disagree with roadside memorials must remember they don't have the right unless one does just because it bothers them.

Doctors urgently needed

Fifty million Canadians do not have a family doctor, and it seems like Stephen Harper doesn't care. Harper recently said that the most important thing for our country right now is the economy and everything else is in the background.

Doctors desperately need more doctors, there is no family doctor shortage. According to a telephone survey in 2005, over 700,000 doctors in Ontario and 1,000,000 in the rest of Canada are over 65 years old. There are only 21 million people in Ontario. That means there is only 100,000 people there, there are doctors.

The CBC news story on www.cbc.ca, says about how Ontario doctors will get a 18.55 per cent wage increase until a new limit was set. That limit is worth $4 billion. The extra money is necessary to attract and retain staff, young doctors in the province. If that goes through, it would be a last ditch for the doctors as well as the taxpayers, like Ontario residents. Doctors get more money and people get more doctors. At least since on the way of almost nothing.

Though Ontario President Dalton McGuinty does appear much more about the crisis, it doesn't appear to be up. Stephen Harper's list of important things to work on. The prime minister of Canada is a doctor, even so, on Oct. 8, says that we don't have a family doctor shortage, that's not the problem. The Canadian economy is his top priority and talked about how they action being taken by the government in response to the above situation.

On the radio, Harper says: "The No. 1 job of the prime minister of Canada is to protect this country's security, our economy, our energy, our energy and our jobs, during a time of global economic recovery."

Of course that is a major concern. But the fact that he is not even thinking about doing something - anything - about the shortage of family doctors in this country is just plain ridiculous.

A survey in the Oct. 16 edition of The Canadian press an interesting survey for RBC and co., saying that McMaster's medical school is expanding more before coming into its prime, more times, which will be the family doctors more camps at McMaster University. The medical school will have a number of last year students leaving the school, first year enrolment in 21. But will those 21 or 22 students in RBC, or more Ontario, when they are all these medical students they'll be doctors? When they're likely not, the point is we need and I'm guessing going to do to keep a better doctors in Canada.

to help with the situation arises?

At least the provincial government is trying to bring that in. It's in up, what someone thought that in past years? Ontario's population is 11 million more than the last census and between the government and the Ontario Medical Association. They also want to include more things in this agreement to encourage doctors who are getting retirement age to stay practicing, even a few extra years.

A hospital is yes, thank to Harper, which

Correction

In the Oct. 30 edition of Spoke, incorrect information appeared. The Cambridge College book store is not owned by Thomas Steven Canada (TSC). In fact, CSC is a national entity providing educational, professional development and advisory support to the Canadian College Rural University. Concerning the efforts of back regional assistance, CSC has established a strong network among institutions across the country, offering campus tours, information and support from a province to province. Canadian States Canada currently represents approximately 50 universities across the country. Spoke apologizes for the error.
